Letter from the Chairman

2020 was a universally challenging year for individuals and institutions. In many realms, the Covid-19 pandemic has permanently altered the ways in which organizations, governments, and economies will function well into the future. Circumstances over the last year have evinced existing issues and exacerbated others of high, even existential, consequence.

The Middle East Institute proved its resilience from an early point, adapting to the new realities of remote work while ensuring the safety of our colleagues and their families. I give my sincerest thanks to our tireless leadership and staff, who did not merely succeed, but excelled, pushing MEI to have one of the most productive years in its 75-year history. Across the board, MEI’s impact through our policy research, education, and elevation of the region’s diverse cultures has remained unmatched.

MEI’s experts provided policy analysis and recommendations to Congress, federal agencies, and the White House as our nation weathered both a public health tragedy and a presidential election that tested the foundations of American democracy. Similarly, attendance at these events increased by as much as tenfold from 2019.

It is with humility and renewed drive we announce that, for the third consecutive year, the University of Pennsylvania’s Think Tanks and Civil Societies Program has ranked MEI as the top Middle East–focused think tank in the United States, and in the top one percent overall of the more than 2,200 think tanks in America.

The Institute will celebrate its 75th anniversary in 2021 with an ambitious agenda. We will host marquee events throughout the year, including major conferences on US foreign policy, cybersecurity, and climate. We will upheld our first–ever Futures Forum this fall, convening leading experts and practitioners in finance, energy, women’s and youth issues, security, and more to anticipate challenges and opportunities on the region’s horizon. We will also expand our Board of Governors and International Advisory Council on the region’s horizon. We will also expand our Board of Governors and International Advisory Council to include new members who share our vision and commitment to the sustainable governance of MEI for the next 75 years.

As Chairman for nearly a decade, I harbor both immense pride in what we have collectively achieved and great hope for the exciting possibilities ahead.

With Gratitude,

Richard A. Clarke, Chairman, Board of Governors

Letter from the President

For MEI, 2020 was the worst of years, but also in some ways the best of years. Our diverse team suffered the same challenges and setbacks that everyone did around the world in the face of a once–in–a–century pandemic.

This forced the closure of our new headquarters, the temporary shuttering of our art gallery and teaching classrooms, and the transition to the world of online work from home. But our amazing team adapted quickly and effectively to the new environment, and within weeks the institution was jumping ahead in terms of the quantity and quality of its output. Our events became virtual, our staff worked remotely, yet our impact reached historic levels. We quickly developed an online system to host public and private events. In doing so, we were able to significantly increase the reach of our work globally and include perspectives from speakers previously limited by geographic distances.

Attendance at our events increased by 1,000%. The Middle East Institute proved its resilience and luminaries worldwide whose circumstances might have previously made travel to DC difficult. Similarly, our staff worked remotely, yet our impact reached historic levels. We quickly developed an online system to host public and private events. It’s clear to me that with the headwinds and transformational opportunities we all face today, we cannot afford for the global community to turn inwards. How much we all embrace this is going to shape growth, prosperity, and sustainability as we recover from Covid and, frankly, for generations to come.

2020 VIRTUAL AWARDS GALA

In response to a year defined by crisis, MEI’s 2020 Annual Awards Gala celebrated human compassion and ingenuity in the face of great tragedy. The virtual event brought together distinguished speakers and attendees from all over the world to honor our awardees: the digital health platform Altibbi, whose Covid-19 hotlines provided low-cost and free critical telemedicine to Jordan, Egypt, Sudan, and Lebanon; and the Egyptian Food Bank, which fed 12 million people in 60 days at the height of the pandemic.
Immediately following World War II, a group of Americans with experience in the Middle East recognized that the region would soon become a critical nexus in the postwar world, and that there existed no organization equipped to address the knowledge gap. They resolved to fill the vacuum. On May 8, 1946, the Middle East Institute (MEI) became the first Washington-based think tank dedicated to the study of the Middle East.

The interdisciplinary concept of area studies was relatively new at the time. It is a testament to our founders’ foresight that the vision they laid out, which saw policy, culture, and education as inextricably intertwined, remains relevant and unchanged to this day.

In its nascent stages, the Institute was an informal group where members met to discuss Middle Eastern affairs. These early members included not only established historians, diplomats, legislators, and anthropologists, but also early-career scholars and professionals who would go on to hold positions of great influence in both the US and the Middle East. Within its first year MEI had published the first issue of the Middle East Journal, created a robust library, and hosted its first annual Middle East Conference. MEI’s membership swelled throughout the 1950s as the Institute started its own scholarly press and began to offer language instruction.

In the 1970s and 80s, American interest in the Middle East reached a new zenith as oil wealth proliferated in the Gulf and a series of regional conflicts commanded global attention. The Institute’s vision, scope, and capacity expanded accordingly. As other think tanks began to focus on Middle Eastern affairs and the field of Middle East studies developed into a vibrant and highly policy-relevant academic discipline, MEI distinguished itself by emphasizing its well-established neutrality on political questions and an environment of open debate accessible to both specialists and the general public.

Post-2001, the prevailing tone in coverage of the Middle East shifted. Terrorism and war dominated media attention. Political polarization led to a retreat of neutral voices and fear infected public discourse. The Institute’s reputation for providing reliable, accurate information and insight on the region grew over the following decade and through the hopeful years of the Arab Uprisings, particularly as its research gained traction among media outlets. Public interest in the Middle East has waxed and waned since MEI’s founding. The role of the United States in the region has evolved, and our collective fates have become ever more intimately entwined. Through it all, MEI has maintained its commitment to objectivity, intellectual rigor, and public service.

As shared and uniquely modern challenges—climate change, cybersecurity, social justice, and others—take center stage, Keiser’s noble vision will continue to animate our every movement.

The Founders

A World War II veteran and scholar of Islamic art and architecture, Keiser was the Institute’s primary benefactor until his death in 1956.

CHRISTIAN HERTER (TOP RIGHT)
Herter was a foreign policy-minded Massachusetts congressman who went on to become Eisenhower’s Secretary of State, and later Kennedy’s US Trade Representative.

Hall was an instructor at the American University of Beirut who became the first editor of the Middle East Journal.

HALFORD HOSKINS (BOTTOM RIGHT)
Hoskins went on to become the founding dean of the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University, and the first director of the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies.

Our MEI@75 programming will include, among other events, a Policy Conference in April on the Biden Administration’s first 100 days, a weeklong Middle East Futures Forum in October, and our 75th Annual Awards Gala in November. Please check our website throughout the year for updates.

MEETING THE MOMENT

This year will mark the 75th anniversary of the Middle East Institute’s founding. While we have come a long way since our founders first convened in 1946, we have remained faithful to the mission they set out: to promote knowledge of the Middle East in America, and to strengthen understanding of the United States by the peoples and governments of the region.

Recognizing that the US-Middle East partnership is not only one between governments, but one between peoples, cultures, and civilizations, today we take a uniquely holistic approach—with integrated programming spanning policy, arts and culture, and education—that helps us reinforce common values, build on shared interests, and reduce mutual threats and risks.

In this period of unprecedented turbulence, we aim to take advantage of opportunities to work with the new administration, regional leaders, and other stakeholders to advance productive American engagement with the Middle East. We intend to leverage our expertise and expand on our policy work to meet the needs of today—and anticipate the needs of the future.

The task before us is daunting. So this year, while we will reflect on our legacy and celebrate 75 years of MEI, we are setting our sights on the next 75.

An Integrated Think Tank for the 21st Century

MEI is leading the way for a new kind of think tank: one that thrives at the intersection of policy and culture. Our centers reflect our dedication to promoting a more comprehensive understanding of the region.

Policy Impact
The Policy Center brings unmatched expertise and influence, convening key stakeholders, producing original research, and communicating with decision makers.

Education
Our Education Center offers a wide variety of resources, including language classes and a library, to increase knowledge of the region and shape the next generation of experts.

Cultural Diplomacy
The Arts and Culture Center builds bridges through cultural programming for diverse audiences, providing a platform for dialogue, and reinforcing shared values through the arts.

Our MEI@75 programming will include, among other events, a Policy Conference in April on the Biden Administration’s first 100 days, a weeklong Middle East Futures Forum in October, and our 75th Annual Awards Gala in November. Please check our website throughout the year for updates.

For 75 years, MEI’s Policy Center has been the bedrock of the organization. With 18 dedicated programs, 25 resident and more than 120 non-resident experts, MEI covers the countries of the region as well as emerging and cross-cutting issues such as cybersecurity, climate change, and defense and security, and looks broadly at the region’s trajectory through our Strategic Foresight Initiative.
Like all organizations, MEI responded to the pandemic by shifting to remote work and events. In addition, we connected with organizations on the ground in the Middle East to share national and regional responses and best practices. The Covid-19 pandemic, an ongoing global tragedy, radically changed the lives of people across the Middle East. MEI provided in-depth analysis of the virus’s effects across the region, focusing on both the immediate impact and the potential long-term ramifications of this “black swan” event.

The US Presidential Election and New Administration

Leading up to the election, MEI assembled a briefing book for the presidential candidates offering insight from scholars on key issues in the Middle East and contributed to broader discussions about the challenges and opportunities for US policy in the region.

The US presidential election in November ultimately had significant ramifications for American policy toward the Middle East. MEI provided robust coverage of how the election was received across the region and the potential impact of the transition from the Trump to Biden administrations. In addition, MEI held a number of webinars to elaborate on important topics to brief the next administration.

Building a Regional Think Tank Network

Making the most of the circumstances, the pandemic-driven transition to an all-virtual format gave MEI the opportunity to establish a network of regional think tanks stretching from the United States and the Middle East to hold a semester-long student-run forum. These include a series on human rights and migration, which has highlighted the work of activists and others on the ground in the region; the “Voices from Turkish Politics” series, bringing prominent figures in the Turkish political sphere to MEI’s platform; the MEI Leadership Series, which has to date featured the Foreign Ministers of Jordan and the UAE, the Prime Minister of Palestine, and others; and its companion Defense Leadership Series, which is a forum for current and former high-level military and defense leaders from both the United States and the Middle East.

The following are 2020 highlights from some of our policy programs.

GLOBAL AFFAIRS

Cyber Program

In 2020, the new Cyber Program published its first book, Cyber War and Cyber Peace in the Middle East, bringing together leading cyber scholars from the US and the region to examine the various issues confronting the region in the realms of cyber security, information operations, surveillance, and authoritarian control of cyberspace. The program’s study group met in May to discuss promoting stability in cyberspace and regulating the sale of hacking tools, a meeting that formed the backbone of the book’s final chapter focusing on policy solutions to create a more secure and safe regional cyberspace.

In September’s study group meeting, we focused on how to apply the conclusions of the Cyberspace Solarium Commission to US foreign policy in the Middle East. This led to the development of a cyber addendum to the Abraham Accords prepared at the request of the White House National Security Council. The proposed addendum would promote mutual cooperation and confidence-building between the US and Israel.

Strategic Foresight Initiative

With an eye towards the future, MEI also launched the Strategic Foresight Initiative in 2020. The aim of the initiative is to look over the horizon at key drivers of change that could create alternative futures for the Middle East region and help decision-makers chart a course forward. The program is led by Steven Kenney, who worked for more than 15 years with world-renowned futurist Alvin Toffler (author of the seminal book Future Shock), and counts as collaborators highly-regarded foresight practitioners from Carleton University, the National Defense University, and the European Union Institute for Security Studies, among others.

The Strategic Foresight Initiative published “Middle East Conflict and Covid–19: A View From 2025,” which suggests that the pandemic could potentially be a spur for reimagining regional security cooperation as an “architecture” of institutional mechanisms focused on resilience. The program also worked with MEI’s Frontier Europe Initiative, developing a set of alternative future scenarios that will inform recommendations from Frontier Europe on a future US strategy for the Black Sea region.

Launch of the Research Unit

In an effort to lead critical conversations, promote analyses, and define resolutions of the critical cross-cutting issues that will challenge the region and US regional policies, MEI launched a new Research Unit to identify key issues that will drive political, economic, and social developments in the region over the next decade. Drawing on the establishment of the Regional Think Tank Network, the Research Unit will work with MEI resident and non-resident scholars to develop collaborative projects addressing such issues as environment and climate, democracy and governance, macro-economy, demography, and refugees and migration to ultimately present implementable recommendations to regional public and private sector entities as well as the US government and international organizations.

MEI established several new long-term events and initiatives in 2020. In partnership with Southern Methodist University and Howard University, MEI is developing a program to bring together university students from the United States and the Middle East to hold a semester-long student-run forum. These include a series on human rights and migration, which has highlighted the work of activists and others on the ground in the region; the “Voices from Turkish Politics” series, bringing prominent figures in the Turkish political sphere to MEI’s platform; the MEI Leadership Series, which has to date featured the Foreign Ministers of Jordan and the UAE, the Prime Minister of Palestine, and others; and its companion Defense Leadership Series, which is a forum for current and former high-level military and defense leaders from both the United States and the Middle East.

The Strategic Foresight Initiative published “Middle East Conflict and Covid–19: A View From 2025,” which suggests that the pandemic could potentially be a spur for reimagining regional security cooperation as an “architecture” of institutional mechanisms focused on resilience. The program also worked with MEI’s Frontier Europe Initiative, developing a set of alternative future scenarios that will inform recommendations from Frontier Europe on a future US strategy for the Black Sea region.
guished individuals, to guide the program going forward. It has also secured new program support from Bahrain’s Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Vincent Viola, who established West Point’s Combating Terrorism Center. These developments will elevate the program and promote its pivotal work, which in 2020 included outstanding publications like “Rethinking US Counterterrorism Policy” by non-resident scholar and 30-year CIA veteran Douglas London. London argues that America is long overdue to update its counterterrorism strategy and, perhaps more importantly, how we measure success—while terrorist groups have innovated and adapted, US strategy has remained unchanged, fighting yesterday’s war while neglecting both present-day threats and those over the near horizon. To complement this work, we held an accompanying public event featuring Christopher Costa (former NSC, US Navy SEAL) and Karen Greenberg (Fordham University).

Defence and Security

The Defence and Security Program at MEI is one of the fastest-growing and most prestigious defense programs in the US public policy community. With a roster that includes national security luminaries such as former US Central Command (CENTCOM) commander Joseph Votel and former Special Operations Command (SOCOM) commander Michael Nagata, the program is well-positioned to continue its high-impact, policy-relevant work on US defense policy and strategy in the region.

Launched in June 2020, the program’s ongoing Defence Leadership Series has been a tremendous success, with nine episodes featuring the nation’s top defense and military leaders including CENTCOM’s current commander, General Kenneth F. McKenzie, and Vice Admiral James Malloy, the Command’s new deputy commander who previously served as the commander of Naval Central Command (NAVCENT). Other guests included the current director of the Defense Security Cooperation Agency (DSCA), Heidi Grant, and the former Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, Michele Flournoy. The Defence Leadership Series has solidified the Institute’s intellectual partnership with CENTCOM, which is unique among US think tanks.

Program Director Bilal Saab penned an October op-ed for Defense One on the Pentagon’s new initiative to strengthen US alliances and partnerships, which prompted the Department of Defense to invite him to present his thoughts virtually to top US defense leadership. A later analysis for Foreign Policy entitled “Trump’s Curious Multilateralism” on US efforts to promote a multilateral approach to regional security at sea in the Persian Gulf similarly led to a virtual meeting with NAVCENT.

Regional Affairs

Syria Program

MEI was proud to establish a standalone Syria Program in 2020, which last year recruited 15 world-leading non-resident scholars who now provide expertise on every aspect of the Syrian crisis and accompanying situations. The program convened all 15 scholars from around the world.

Additions to the MEI Team

STEVEN KENNEY

COORDINATOR OF STRATEGIC FORESIGHT INITIATIVE

Steven Kenney is the founder and principal of Foresight Vector LLC, an advisory firm he created to help organizations develop the strategies they need to achieve their greatest success. He is widely recognized for his expertise and brings 25 years of experience in technical applications of strategic foresight methods to MEI as the founding coordinator of the Strategic Foresight Initiative.

Steven’s work includes advisory engagements for top executives in Fortune 500 and other leading corporations. He has also designed and led engagements for leaders in Cabinet–level departments of the US government, and for dozens of federal and foreign government agencies. Prior to founding Foresight Vector, Steven was a Vice President at Monitor 360 and a Partner at Toffler Associates, the executive advisory firm founded by world-renowned futurist Alvin Toffler, with whom he worked for more than 15 years.

CHRIS KUBECKA

DISTINGUISHED CHAIR, CYBER PROGRAM

Chris Kubecka joined the Cyber Program in November 2020. A cyberwarfare and information security expert best known for her groundbreaking work in 2012 rebuilding Saudi Aramco’s network after a devastating cyberattack, Kubecka brings a wealth of expertise to the program. She is the founder and CEO of HypaSec, which provides incident management, ethical hacking training, and cyber advisory services to governments. She is also a USAF veteran, having served as an aircrew member and later in military intelligence with Space Command. Kubecka has published articles and books on offensive security, cyberwarfare, and open source intelligence gathering, and advises EU and NATO member cyberwarfare exercises. world with the US Departments of State and Treasury for a brainstorming session on Syria policy. The State facilitator subsequently labeled the meeting “the best external engagement” of 2020.

The Syria Program also recruited 16 leading experts to inaugurate its Advisory Council, including Ryan Crocker, former US ambassador to Syria and Presidential Medal of Freedom recipient, and Hind Kabawat, deputy head of the Syrian Negotiation Commission’s Geneva office. MEI published more than 110 pieces of analysis and policy research in 2020 focused on Syria—we anticipate growth to continue in 2021.

Egypt Program

While the Egypt Program was subject to the same restrictions that all other programs had to contend with in 2020, it did manage to adapt; the program drew several high-level guests and speakers, among them Egyptian Prime Minister Mostafa Madbouly and almost a half-dozen ministers. Pandemic travel restrictions meant that in-person events were out of the question, but we nevertheless secured the participation of the ministers of International Cooperation and Petroleum, the latter for an oversubscribed invitation-only meeting.

The program held several webinars, among the most successful being “Egypt’s Economy Under Covid: Threats and Opportunities.” Part of the program’s related work was a very well-received report titled “Rethinking Egypt’s Economy,” which examined the inherent weaknesses laid bare by the pandemic and presented practical solutions for rectifying them.

Additionally, in recognition of Egypt’s increasingly complex network of geopolitical relationships and their ramifications, the program now also covers the Horn of Africa. We have taken on the highly-respected scholar Guleid Ahmed as a nonresident, the first of several planned, to provide regional and local context.

Turkey Program

In 2020, MEI’s Turkey Program launched the “Voices from Turkish Politics” series featuring prominent individuals from Turkey’s Parliament. So far we have hosted the leaders of three opposition parties: Ahmet Davutoğlu, the leader of the Future Party; Kemal Kılıçdaroğlu, the leader of the People’s Republican Party; and Temel Karamollaoğlu, the leader of the Islamist Felicity Party, as well as an independent MP, Changırı Islam. In the words of a Washington Post reporter, the series has been the “most useful Turkey event in town in years” and has provided a “platform for key names in Turkish politics who are not well-known in Western circles.” Heads of Turkey programs at the Center for American Progress, CSIS, and Brookings, as well as Turkey experts at Carnegie and Chatham House, said they found the series “extremely helpful.”

The program’s weekly Turkish-language show Transatlantik, hosted by award-winning Turkish journalist Rusen Çakır, became one of Turkey’s top three most-watched online foreign policy shows in 2020. Program Director Gonul Tol’s opinion piece in Foreign Policy on Turkey’s generation Z was ranked one of their top five articles of 2020.

Iran Program

After three years of increasing tensions between the Iranian regime and the Trump administration, 2020 opened with the assassination of IRGC Quds Force leader Gen. Qassem Soleimani—a dramatic escalation by the United States that brought us to the brink of war. The dust had hardly settled by March, when it became clear that Iran had become one of the earliest epicenters of the Covid-19 pandemic. From these events to the mysterious summer series of cyberattacks on critical Iranian infrastructure to the ramifications of the US presidential election, the Iran Program covered in detail one of the most turbulent years in recent memory for the US-Iran relationship.

The program’s scope evolved in 2020 with several firsts. It joined several other MEI programs in establishing a dedicated advisory board.

The program also held a record number of virtual panels, including MEI’s first joint event with the London’s Royal Institute of International Relations, and an insightful panel that brought a co-founder of Iran’s Revolutionary Guard together with two former CIA clandestine officers who worked on the agency’s Iran file. Finally, Iran Program experts are taking the lead in collaboration on inter- and intra-regional research, working extensively with MEI’s Frontier Europe Initiative as well as launching a project on Iran-GCC environmental cooperation that has seen early success and interest from policymakers.

Afghanistan and Pakistan Program

The Afghanistan and Pakistan Program had its strongest impact during 2020 in two areas: in advocating for a more realistic view of the prospects of an Afghan peace process, and in its contribution to a better appreciation of Pakistan’s often difficult relations with the US and Afghanistan. In both, we were able to provide a somewhat different perspective from mainstream analyses. In discussing broad efforts to find a political solution to the Afghan conflict, much of our activity was directed at underscoring the obstacles posed by the Taliban’s motives and core beliefs and arguing for a more realistic view of them.

The program undertook numerous activities in 2020 aimed at improving understanding of Pakistan’s role in Afghanistan and identifying areas of common interest and divergence between the US and Pakistan. The program has been particularly interested in proposing a more balanced and nuanced view of what Pakistan can and cannot be expected to do in support of US policies on Afghanistan. The principal product of our focus on US-Pakistan ties was a report identifying pathways to a more sustainable bilateral relationship, which was supplemented by a public event and wide discussion of its findings in various venues in Pakistan. Program experts also contributed to the aforementioned MEI presidential briefing project and briefed State Department officials on two occasions.

Finally, the program recruited three new nonresident scholars in 2020, and established an advisory council composed of four former American and Pakistani ambassadors and a leading media entrepreneur in Afghanistan.
THE MIDDLE EAST AND THE WORLD

Frontier Europe Initiative

Having been established less than four months before Covid-19 shut down most of the world, the Frontier Europe Initiative had a challenging but ultimately promising and productive first year. The Initiative covers topics including Black Sea security, regional economies, and democracy and rule of law, gaining recognition in 2020 in the think tank community and within US and regional governments for its unique mandate and scope.

USAF General Philip Breedlove (ret.), former Commander of US European Command and Supreme Allied Commander Europe, joined the Frontier Europe Initiative as distinguished chair in 2020. Since joining the program, he has been published in major outlets covering key issues in the region. Frontier Europe hosted 13 virtual events, published 94 articles, and recruited numerous nonresident scholars in 2020.

The Frontier Europe Initiative also launched a first-of-its-kind Black Sea Security Task Force, which hosted three successful meetings in 2020 and is working to publish a Black Sea security policy document in early 2021. Additionally, the Initiative launched two fellowship programs: the Frontier Europe non-resident fellowship and Black Sea resident fellowship. Ten individuals were selected, hailing from Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, Georgia, Moldova, Ukraine, and Romania. These fellows will continue to contribute content and attend intensive biweekly workshops through mid-2021. Due to pandemic restrictions, the fellows are completing the program virtually instead of traveling to Washington, DC as planned.

Middle East-Asia Project

MEI’s Middle East-Asia Project (MAP), established in 2009, explores the multidimensional relations between the two regions through scholarly analysis of cross-regional economic, political, security, and social/cultural interactions and their implications. It seeks to foster collaborative research on these issues through building an online community of experts and forging institutional partnerships.

In 2020, MAP’s many global contributors published 43 essays covering a wide variety of issues like security relations between Israel and Southeast Asia, China’s economic stabilization efforts in Afghanistan, migrant laborers in the Gulf, China’s Ferghana Railway, Japan’s diplomatic efforts in Libya, and de-radicalization programs for foreign fighters returning to Malaysia. In November, MAP launched a series of responses to the Covid-19 pandemic, which will continue into 2021 and cover how national governments, local authorities, civil society actors, and others across the Middle East and Asia have dealt with the public health emergency and its consequent adverse economic effects.

Program Director John Calabrese participated in several off-the-record briefings on China–MENA relations with members of the recently-created “China Watchers” group inside the State Department’s NEA Bureau and analysts encompassing both China and the MENA region from various US intelligence agencies. He also provided testimony to the US–China Economic and Security Commission on China–Iran relations in the broader context of growing Chinese involvement in the region.

MEI sets up a five-year grantmaking program, called the United States Outreach Fund, that ultimately awards 114 grants totaling $685,000 to organizations conducting small-but-significant educational programs about the Middle East. Projects include traveling exhibitions, teacher workshops, curriculum development, and seed money for “sister city initiatives” and reach nearly every corner of the US.

2020

While most think tanks have tended to view Palestine’s internal political affairs through a distinctly Israeli lens or within the context of a now-defunct peace process, the program seeks instead to place Palestinian voices and Palestinian political and economic interests at the center of its research and programming, while promoting a greater appreciation within the policy community for Palestinian rights, security, and prosperity.

In June the program launched a Graduate Fellowship in Palestinian Affairs—the first of its kind in Washington—which is aimed at cultivating a cadre of young scholars interested in pursuing a career in international affairs and/or US foreign policy with a focus on Palestinian affairs. It also recruited three new nonresident scholars: Zena Agha, Anas Iqtait, and Carol Daniel Kasbari.

Publications during the tumultuous year covered Trump’s January “deal of the century,” Covid-19 in the West Bank and Gaza, the Abraham Accords, then-Secretary of State Pompeo’s visit to Israeli settlements, and the US presidential election. MEI hosted several related webinars, including a two-part series on “The Future of Palestinian Politics under a Biden Administration,” and hosted virtual roundtables with Palestinian Prime Minister Mohammad Shtayyeh and EU Special Representative Susamh Terstal.

PALESTINE AND PALESTINIAN-ISRAELI AFFAIRS

In 2020, the future of Palestine and the Palestinian people approached a critical crossroads, as did prospects for a diplomatic settlement. Under the Trump administration, both US-Palestinian relations and Washington’s role as a credible mediator reached an all-time low. However, the new Biden administration provides an opportunity to reset US-Palestinian relations as well as create the political space for Palestinians to revive the Palestinian national project. To that end, MEI’s new Palestine and Palestinian-Israeli Affairs Program, led by renowned scholar Khaled Elgindy, is uniquely positioned to help shape the policy debate on Palestine and its political and social future.
Panels featuring robust discussion between MEI scholars and prominent speakers from around the globe have always been a core part of the Policy Center at MEI. Like everything else in 2020, these events were compelled to adapt their programs for the virtual sphere almost overnight. MEI scholars, guests, and staff were able to make this transition smoothly, continuing to bring in prominent speakers and draw hundreds of viewers for each event, to ultimately host over 150 successful events throughout the year.

Shown here (in clockwise order):

MEI’s Arts and Culture Center elevates the voices of the region’s artists, writers, and filmmakers, providing a platform for inclusive dialogue to foster cross-cultural understanding and communication between the Middle East and the United States. The Center has earned a reputation for unique programs introducing audiences to the region’s vibrant arts communities and to the pressing issues being addressed by its artists.
MEI’s Arts and Culture Center promotes the work of young Middle Eastern artists and connects them with their American counterparts through programs, workshops, roundtable discussions, and events that explore the role of art and artists in social change.

While MEI has a history dating back to its founding of undertaking cultural initiatives as part of its regular activities, the Center’s establishment in 2014 gave those activities a focus, an experienced staff, and, eventually, a dedicated facility. This allowed us to host dozens of exhibitions, film screenings, musical and dance performances, and poetry readings in partnership with prominent institutions like the Kennedy Center and the National Museum of Women in the Arts.

In 2020, the Center faced significant challenges in order to continue to present the innovative programming it is known for. Our new gallery, which had been open for less than six months, closed to the public in March as Covid-19 guidelines began to shut down American cities. Staff worked hard to find ways to preserve planned exhibitions and support affected artists. By the year’s end, we had not only organized and executed our first open call and sale of art, but also had organized an ambitious virtual exhibition, we had also planned and executed our first open call and sale of art, and we were able to host dozens of exhibitions, film screenings, musical and dance performances, and poetry readings in partnership with prominent institutions like the Kennedy Center and the National Museum of Women in the Arts.

In place of our fall show, we envisioned an exhibit more responsive to the global crisis. Art in Isolation: Creativity in the Time of Covid-19 sprung from this desire. We launched an open call in June and received more than 200 entries from artists from Morocco to Yemen. The 53 selected works, which were all available for sale, were exhibited both online and in person by appointment. We are grateful to have been able to provide the majority of the proceeds to the artists in a time of great uncertainty.

EXHIBITIONS

The MEI Art Gallery opened in September 2019 to bring the region’s most exciting contemporary and modern art, photography, and video to the United States. When it closed to the public in March 2021, Center leadership quickly shifted gears, postponing two planned shows and working with international partners to reimagine an upcoming exhibit of Lebanese photography as an innovative virtual 3D experience. The resulting show, Lebanon Then and Now: Photography from 2004–2020, struck a chord around the world: nearly 23,000 visitors viewed the online exhibition, with the Washington Post concluding it “couldn’t be more timely.”

Speaking Across Mountains: Kurdish Artists in Dialogue

CURATED BY HEBA ELKAYAL

Our Winter 2020 show featured ten contemporary artists from Iraq, Syria, and Turkey. Through drawing, painting, sculpture, textile, installation, photography, and video, the artists explored themes that have long shaped the Kurdish experience, such as displacement, exile, memory, gender, and autonomy, while giving voice to the resilience of Kurdish communities in the face of decades of persecution.

Lebanon Then and Now: Photography from 2006–2020

CURATED BY CHANTALE FAHMI

MEI’s Summer 2020 show was an immersive 360° exhibit that captured both the aftermath of the country’s 15-year civil war and the street protests that erupted in October 2019, telling the story of the troubled calm that presaged Lebanon’s current storm and the struggle for social justice and democracy that continues to this day. The show was created in partnership with Institut du Monde Arabe, the Beirut Museum of Art USA, the Beirut Center of Photography, and the Association for the Promotion and Exhibition of the Arts in Lebanon.

By the end of 2020, just over a year from its opening, the MEI Art Gallery and its four shows have been covered in 40 articles by major publications, and reached millions of people around the world.

ARTS PROGRAMMING

In addition to its exhibitions, the Arts and Culture Center programmed film screenings and musical performances prior to Covid, as well as a series of webinars exploring the impact of the pandemic on the arts and culture sectors in the Middle East. During the April webinar “Adapting and Innovating in the Face of Covid-19,” Oscar–nominated Lebanese filmmaker Nadine Labaki, award-winning Tunisian artist and activist El Seed, and Sharjah Art Foundation director Sheikha Hoor al Qasimi joined moderator and Freer | Sackler Galleries Director Chase Robinson to talk about the role that creative communities can play in the pandemic response moving forward. In a later panel, “Writing Covid–19: Middle Eastern Authors Reflect on the Pandemic,” best-selling authors Nezar Afisi, Ece Temelkuran, and Elie Khoury explored how societies in Iran, Turkey, and the Arab world are responding to the crisis, leading Khoury to observe that Covid–19 has underscored how humanity can best survive through “deep human connection ...and exchange.”

“Every day is different. One day, I’m happy. One day, I’m sad. One day, I’m anxious. The next, I’m OK. The next, I’m hysterical. The next, I’m scared. But what comforts me is knowing that I and everyone on the planet are going through the same thing.”

CAROL MANSOUR, LEBANESE FILMMAKER
“A COVID-EO DIARY”

“Photography has the ability to document time and reality. Both our real lives and photography have evolved, and with this revolution, the way the Lebanese people perceive their reality has also changed. In Lebanon, particularly now, we are more appreciative of preserving the memories and the moments captured in pictures. Now, more and more, we have respect for photojournalists—and this is why we wanted to give them this opportunity as artists to keep our history.”

Education has been a part of MEI’s core mission since our founding in 1946. The Education Center at MEI is home to the Languages and Regional Studies Department, the Middle East Journal, the Oman Library, and the Leadership Development Program, which equip the next generation of leaders with the skills necessary for international careers.

Wendy Chamberlin, former US ambassador to Pakistan and UN deputy high commissioner for refugees, becomes the first woman to lead MEI. She serves for 11 years, spearheading the modernization of the Institute.
LANGUAGES AND REGIONAL STUDIES

Like the rest of MEI, the Education Center’s language classes and private tutoring were forced to go entirely online in early 2020. The innovative agility of our remarkable languages staff and faculty turned what could have been a crippling obstacle into an unexpected opportunity, expanding course availability and accessibility and drawing students from around the world for the first time. Growth surpassed the last three years. Demand for Persian instruction in particular increased enormously as our reputation for Persian language training grew. The Education Center now offers 20 language courses, with multiple proficiency levels, covering Arabic, Persian, Hebrew, and Turkish. New daytime classes, which now include conversation courses, have been introduced to accommodate international students’ schedules.

In light of our newfound virtual success, Education Center Deputy Director Shabnam Jafari is working to create pre-recorded language classes and regional studies seminars to target audiences outside of DC. In 2021, this undertaking will produce several easily-downloadable video series through which students will be able to learn at their own pace. THE MIDDLE EAST JOURNAL

Published continuously since 1947, our flagship quarterly is the oldest peer-reviewed publication in North America dedicated to the study of the contemporary Middle East. Each issue includes five articles, a chronology of current events organized by subject and country, and book reviews that are among the most respected, comprehensive, and up-to-date in the field of Middle East studies. The Journal has published the writings of the foremost voices in the field—renowned scholars, historians, foreign policy analysts, and area experts—for 74 years, and will continue to provide quality research and analysis of the political, economic, environmental, social, and cultural development of the region.

Last year, demonstrating its enduring value to readers, the Journal experienced an unexpected increase in readership on our subscriber platform and through direct access despite decreased traffic to main academic platforms and library databases overall due to the pandemic. MEI’s shift to fully-virtual operations also prompted Journal leadership to innovate on a number of fronts, most notably in its communications strategy. We organized a spotlight panel around our Winter issue, and will increasingly produce Journal-relevant content for web media.
OMAN LIBRARY
In January 2020, with new librarian Victoria Jacobs at the helm, the Oman Library reopened its doors to the public after a two-year closure during the renovation of MEI’s main building. Two months later, the Covid-19 pandemic shut them again. However, as of mid-2020, visits may now be arranged by contacting the librarian via phone or email. MEI members may now set up a library account at no additional charge, which will allow them to check out books, place holds, renew, or create lists via the Online Public Access Catalog. The Digitized Rare Books collection has also been updated and now includes a simple search, where users can filter the displayed books based on the full or partial title. Anyone may visit the library catalog from home at catalog.mei.edu, where curious individuals will also find a growing list of free resource guides, as well as other useful links.

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM
MEI’s internship program has been instrumental to our pursuit of our long-term educational goals for nearly 50 years. In that time, at least 2,500 students and young professionals have completed the program. Intern alumni have gone on to careers in Congress, the US and foreign diplomatic corps, international development, global business, cultural institutions, intelligence, policy advocacy, political campaigns, and academia around the world.

Last year brought two major milestones for the program. In March 2020, we transitioned our spring interns to remote work mid-term for their safety. The program remained fully virtual for both the summer and fall terms. While the adjustment was challenging, it made the selection process more equitable and inclusive; because applicants no longer had to live in or relocate to Washington, DC, our summer and fall cohorts were some of the most diverse in our history. In an effort to build on this momentum and broaden the group of young people who see international affairs as an appealing and viable career path for themselves, MEI will also offer stipends to interns for the first time beginning in January 2021. We understand that by investing in our young leaders we are laying the foundations for a more peaceful and prosperous future and we intend to continue our efforts.

COLLECTION HIGHLIGHT: THE COLBERT HELD ARCHIVE
Thanks to a generous donation in 2014 from the late Dr. Colbert Held, a former Foreign Service Officer and professor of Middle Eastern history and geography, the Oman Library possesses approximately 18,500 fully-annotated color Kodachrome slides—images of the Middle East taken between 1957 and 2003. Dr. Held’s photographs capture the most pivotal time in the region’s modern history, systematically documenting the cultural, political, and economic changes that drove the region’s unprecedented development in the latter half of the twentieth century and preserving images of heritage sites that are at risk or have already fallen victim to ongoing violence and campaigns of destruction by militant groups.
LOOKING FORWARD

The Middle East of tomorrow must work toward building a more stable and cooperative regional order, ending civil wars, rebuilding failed states, more effectively leveraging economic and technological opportunities, and establishing a region of peace, prosperity and good governance. The US has a vital strategic interest in working through collaborative and sustainable partnerships in the region to advance these goals, and MEI intends to be at the forefront of these efforts for many years to come.

Looking ahead, MEI seeks to set itself apart from the field by building upon its strengths in convening regional policymakers and stakeholders, working across disciplines, and helping to shape a more locally-focused and holistic approach to the future of the Middle East and its people. We must also adopt an approach befitting the cross-cutting and inter-regional nature of future-oriented issues.

Policy Center

For the Policy Center this approach means strategically expanding the scope of our coverage. Our recently-instituted programs on cybersecurity, strategic foresight, and Frontier Europe have already forged excellent reputations. Nascent programs on North Africa and climate change, water, and environment are close behind. In the coming years we intend to establish new initiatives on women’s issues, economy and development, the Levant, and the Horn of Africa, in addition to better leveraging valuable existing programs like the longstanding Middle East-Asia Project. Expertise in these fields will only become more critical as increasing multipolarity adds layers of complexity to growing global interdependence. We also aim to make our new regional think tank network into a permanent, symbiotic association that can quickly mobilize to gather and synthesize local data and insights where they are needed.

Arts and Culture Center

MEI’s Arts and Culture Center has similarly ambitious plans for the future. We seek to expand the Center’s current mission—promoting the arts of the region through exhibitions and dialogues—to become a convener of cultural leaders from the US and the Middle East. We will create meaningful and sustainable partnerships with major arts institutions both at home and in the region. Through a new annual summit, we aim to deepen ties between Middle Eastern and American cultural sectors by exchanging capacity-building knowledge, discussing cutting-edge issues relating to the arts, and finding pathways for collaboration. We will also strive to build the Center into a nexus of cultural activity that is deeply rooted in the communities we serve through grassroots initiatives like working with local schools to provide workshops on the arts and cultures of the Middle East to middle and high school students.

Education Center

The programs that are part of MEI’s Education Center have long served the nation’s capital. In pursuit of our mission, we intend for them to serve the world. The pandemic accelerated plans for new digital operations in every department as we rushed to make our services available to audiences who could no longer come to us. The changes have put us further along the path toward our goals than we could have anticipated a year ago, and we have no intention of slowing our momentum. We aim to provide language and regional studies courses to an increasingly global student body, improving accommodations for learners abroad and creating a growing catalog of on-demand online courses. We also intend to make as many of the Oman Library’s invaluable resources as possible available digitally to support researchers around the world. Finally, inspired by the diversity of our virtual internship cohorts, we will strive to make our intern recruitment process and program requirements more equitable, to build a future for the fields of foreign policy and Middle Eastern affairs that is more truly inclusive and democratic.

We join millions of voices around the world in mourning those we lost in 2020. Leaders, artists, activists; family, neighbors, friends—each and every one a distinct, incalculable sorrow. In a year of staggering human tragedy, we honor the memory of loved ones whose lives were cut short by sickness, injustice, and conflict. Let our shared grief remind us to extend the same compassion to strangers that we would to friends, and let the lessons we learned inspire us to create a safer, more equitable world now and for generations to come.

Our future depends on us.
